Not illustrated. 1889 Excerpt: . . . in comets at aphelion and planetary nebulae, the spectra are identical, consisting simply of magnesium radiation (X 500). With the first increase of temperature continuous spectrum is added in both cases. As the nebulous swarm condenses, an apparent star, with a spectrum consisting of bright fluting and lines, is the result, and this is also the case in cometary swarms. Still further condensation of the nebulous swarm results in a body of Group II. giving mixed carbon radiation and metallic fluting absorption; and this, also, is a well-marked stage in the development of cometary spectra. Further condensation in both cases results in line absorption. Schiaparelli's view, therefore, that comets consist of nebulous materials drawn into the solar system by solar attraction, is now abundantly demonstrated by the spectroscopic study of nebulae and comets. The discussion of cometary spectra, therefore, strengthens the general hypothesis, which would...
